Lipase B from Burkholderia cepacia was used to assess the secretion level of E. coli when expressed as the first protein in a multicistronic protein operon. The production of lipase B was much higher than its expression with the pET system in E. coli. In terms of yield, the recombinant E. coli and Bacillus subtilis secreted lipase B gave comparable results. The recombinant E. coli produced a single lipase B, while B. subtilis secreted two active proteins (lipase B and lipase A). Secreted lipase B retained its activity. As opposed to the pET system, it was not necessary for the N-terminal sequence of lipase B to be identical to the first sequence. The N-terminal sequence of extracellular lipase B was not the same as that of intracellular lipase B. This is probably due to proteolytic processing during secretion.The present invention relates to a method for packaging an object and to a packing plant used in such a method. A packing plant, which is commercially available, is used to package in a fixed or linear form a plurality of objects such as plastic bags filled with product. The object is palletized and compressed as a result of the influence of a compression device 648931e174
